King Ailesh

Ailesh took the throne in coronation ceremonies in the year 120 DE at the age of 170. Though it seems Ailesh had never been a member of the Writer's Guild on Garterway, he had spent the first fifty years of his life with Ri'weref (after his own dismissal) working on the Book of D'ni. When the D'ni Writer's Guild was formed in the year 8 DE, Ri'weref made sure Ailesh was placed in charge as the first Grand Master of the Guild.

As Grand Master, he had worked closely with Ri'nerref in the writing of the new Guild of Writer's Oath. The Oath, which was what every member promised to live by, ended up staying in existence (with few minor changes) until 9400 DE.

Records indicate that Ailsh modeled his life very closely to Ri'nerref's. He refused to build himself a palace until a Common Library was opened: as he strongly supported a place where all citizens could have access to Books.

Though there was some minor disagreement on minor issues the building was eventually finished in 233 DE. Although, like his mentor, Aitesh still refused to build himself a palace.

The reign of Aitesh was extremely similar to that of Ri'weref. There was still great excitement for the new ideals and laws of D'ni, and thus great support for Aitesh, making his reign a very smooth one.

Before his third son was born in 256 DE, records indicate that there was a bit of public apprehension over who the next king would be. Aitesh's two eldest sons were fairly rebellious and neither seemed good candidates for the throne, at least in the public's opinion. However as Sitesh's third son grew, it became apparent to the public (although records never give specific reasons) that the boy closely followed his father's ideals. Sitesh must have agreed with public opinion as it was his third son who he selected to succeed him.

Sitesh died of natural causes at the age of 350.
